The Minnesota Supreme Court ruled recently that a quorum to conduct business in the Minnesota House of Representatives is 68 members out of the 134 members called for in the Minnesota Constitution. House Republicans say a quorum is the majority of currently elected members, which is now 67 of 133. chr>

Until a judge ruled that a DFL House candidate who had won his election could not take office because he did not actually live in his district, it appeared the two parties would be tied 67 to 67 in the House, and Republicans and Democrats had agreed to a power-sharing plan.

Should Republicans stick with that power-sharing agreement even though they now have a 67 to 66 majority until the special election in March?
